By Invitation

Split-screen Singapore—what does the future hold?

Tied economically to the optimistic East but mentally to the pessimistic West, Singaporeans are blessed with many big existential questions to answer.

Kishore Mahbubani
For The Straits Times

Should we Singaporeans feel optimistic or pessimistic about the future, especially as we look ahead to 2022? Not an easy question to answer. Our feelings are also influenced by the communities we belong to. And, in the regard Singapore is a truly unique global city. Almost without exception, all the other truly global cities are rooted in either their Western or Eastern cultures. New York and London, Paris and Berlin, clearly breathe and endorse the Western zeitgeist, which is also strong in pessimism.

But the question is, is there any truth in this? Singapore is the only truly global city with one foot in the West and one in the East. Surveys from Pew Research, Harvard and Cambridge University confirm the pessimism in the West. A poll this month from the Harvard Kennedy School found that 52 per cent of young Americans believe that their democracy is either on the brink or a "failed democracy." Even more shockingly, only 7 per cent of young Americans believe that they enjoy a healthy democracy.

A 2019 Pew survey found that 44 per cent of Americans expect standard of living in 10 years, compared with 32 per cent who expect an improvement. A "Deepened" Global Satisfaction with Democracy by Cambridge University published in 2019 found that dissatisfaction with democracy in Anglo-Saxon countries (the US, Australia, Canada, New Zealand and the United Kingdom) has doubled from about a quarter of all individuals in the 1990s, to approximately half today. By contrast, even in China, India and even Indonesia remain poorer developing societies, their populations view the future with optimism. A University of Gillingham survey released last month found that a majority of young people in Indonesia (52 per cent), Bangladesh (54 per cent) and India (56 per cent) think they will be better off than their parents, compared with 41 per cent in America and 32 per cent in the UK.

The Cambridge survey also found that Asia has been a notable exception in the global decline in satisfaction with democracy. It points out: "Whether among the emerging democracies of South-East Asia, the developed democracies of north-east Asia, or in the world's longest-established majordemocracies—America, Britain and India—satisfaction with democratic governance in the East seems highest in other parts of the world."

WESTERN ANGST

So, why are Western populations filled with existential angst? There are deep structural reasons. As documents in great detail in my book: Asia 3.0, the incomes of the bottom 30 per cent in the US have essentially stagnated for several decades. There is an angry, white-collar working class in the US. This explains the 74 million votes that US President Donald Trump got last year. And, here is the real shocker. Despite losing the presidency, Mr Trump's control of the Republican Party is almost absolute. If he runs again in 2024, he may well win.

In short, there is deeply divided and polarised politics in the US. Existential angst about the future is a natural result. The European political order has its own obsessions. Migration remains a deep and polarising issue. Just watch the raucous exchanges between Bolsonaro and poderák and the UK and France over migrants. All over Europe, far right parties are becoming stronger and even respectable in societies as moderate as Sweden. In her book, The Light That Failed, published last year, authors Knauer and Shyu find documentation in devoid details how the "liberal" philosophy of European elites (anchored by those of American elites) have led to a serious backlash among the working classes.

As they write, "For many disillusioned citizens, openness to the world now suggests more grandfathers for anxiety than hope... S sulphorous the phenomena of large-scale migration, electorates in parts of Europe and America are increasingly drawn to xenophobic rhetoric, authoritarian leaders and militarised borders." The stable, centrist governments that used to dominate the European political scene in Europe are clearly under threat.

So, why should all these distinct travails of these Western societies matter to Singaporeans? The simple answer is that Singapore is the only truly global city that has one foot firmly in the West and one foot firmly in the East. As a result, we absorb both the pessimistic zeitgeist of the West and the optimistic zeitgeist of the East. Quite naturally, this makes us schizophrenic.

SINGAPORE’S NEIGHBOURHOOD

It is telling that Minister for Finance Lawrence Wong, when he was discussing questions of Singapore's identity, highlighted the dangers of the rise of autocracy in Singapore as a result of importing culture wars from the West that could give rise to a new identity politics that could polarise society in Singapore. It was wise of Mr Wong to highlight the danger of absorbing Western existential angst.

Singapore is wide open to the most Westernised city in Asia. We function mainly in the English language. Our governance institutions, including the Parliament, civil service, judiciary and educational systems, are firmly rooted in the Anglo-Saxon universe.

This explains why we often know more about what's happening in New York and London than what's happening in Jakarta or Beijing. Thus, why the pessimism of the West seems naturally into our mental veins, while the oceans of optimism in nearby countries such as China, India and Indonesia, the three most populous countries in Asia, rarely penetrate our consciousness.

Our ignorance of Indonesia is shocking. Most Singaporeans can probably remember a recent statement by US President Joe Biden in Brunei Prime Minister Boris Johnson. Yet, few can say the same of President Joko Widodo of Indonesia. Not are they aware that among the most optimistic young people in the world today are the Indonesians.

We are also advised that we live in one of the most promising regions in the world. Japan's gross national product (GNP) is used togormagazines bigger than the collective GNP of the 10 ASEAN countries. Now it is only 0.5 times larger. By 2030, it will be smaller than Asia.

With the launch of the Regional Comprehensive Economic Partnership (RCEP) early next year, Singapore's economy can expect a significant boost as it is newly plugged into this region economically.

SCHIZOPHRENIC SINGAPORE

All this explains the schizophrenia of Singapore. Our respondents are tied to the optimistic East, while our mental veins are tied to the pessimistic West. To resolve these contrasting influences in our minds, it may be useful to spend the year 2022 in reflection on where the long-term destiny of Singapore will be.

This is why both Straits Times Press and I thought that it would be timely to release a revised and updated edition of my book: Singapore Survives?, which was first published in 2016.

The book does not necessarily provide all the answers to Singapore's future challenges. However, it raises many of the existential questions that Singaporeans will have to grapple with as they try to find their way in this new Asian century.

I have often referenced in my previous Straits Times columns, the eight-week holiday training we (Western) philosophers watched the most important part of learning was in finding the right answers. It was in finding the right questions. A philosopher's questioning mind is an essential skill for a Singaporean as we try to manage the unavoidable schizophrenia in our smithereens between our Western and Eastern identities.

Raising and answering questions may seem troublesome; yet, the one key point that both Eastern and Western philosophies agree on is that a skill spent inductive thinking is the most satisfying life to have. And we Singaporeans are blessed with many big existential questions to answer.

stopiongms@gmail.com

Kishore Mahbubani, a veteran journalist and a diplomat, is a fellow at the Asia Research Institute at the National University of Singapore, and the author of several books, including the updated ST Press book Can Singapore Survive?, which is available at stbookstore.com.