

Majority of Singapore residents feel racism is an important problem: Poll

Survey also shows those who hold this view tend to be younger and better educated

Choo Yun Ting

A majority of Singapore residents feel that racism remains an important problem today, and those who feel this way tend to be younger and more highly educated, according to a recent survey.

About 56.2 per cent of those polled think that racism remains an important problem, an increase from the 46.3 per cent of respondents who felt this way in a 2016 edition of the survey.

This was surfaced in the findings of the latest CNA-Institute of Policy Studies survey on race relations published on Saturday.

More than 2,000 Singapore residents aged 21 and above were polled between last November and January, with an over-representation of Malay and Indian respondents – by twice their national proportions – to ensure minorities were well represented in the survey.

The survey also showed that respondents have grown more open over the last five years to the idea of a non-Chinese prime minister or president.

Most of those surveyed were accepting of a Singaporean Malay (82.2 per cent) or Singaporean Indian (82 per cent) as the president, up from 65.5 per cent and 70.6 per cent, respectively, in 2016.

On the other hand, respondents were very uncomfortable with the idea of a new citizen from any country taking on the role of prime minister or president.

Overall, younger respondents were found to be more likely than older ones to feel that racism is an important problem today – 63 per cent of those between 21 and 50 years old felt this way, compared with 46.8 per cent of those aged between 51 and 65, and 47.4 per cent of those above 65.

“The stronger focus on racism among younger respondents may be due to their greater exposure to commentary about race issues on social media, where woke and cancel culture encourage minorities in particular to call out examples of casual racism,” the report said.

“Older respondents tend to have lower levels of engagement with online media.”

Those with higher education levels were also shown to be more likely to think racism is an important problem.

The findings also noted that most respondents of all races believe that success in Singapore is not contingent on race, similar to sentiments in the 2016 survey.

At the same time, 97 per cent of those surveyed were optimistic about the future of meritocracy for

Views on the persistence of racism

Statement about race: Racism may have been a problem in the past, but it is not an important problem today

2022 survey ■
2016 survey ■

Racial groups	Strongly disagree	Disagree	Agree	Strongly agree
Overall	16.7% 10.6%	39.5% 35.7%	40.1% 43.4%	3.7% 10.4%
Chinese	16.5% 9.7%	39.6% 36.9%	40.1% 43.7%	3.8% 9.7%
Malay	20.1% 12.5%	34.6% 33.4%	42.7% 46.3%	2.5% 7.7%
Indian	16.8% 13.2%	37% 33.8%	40.7% 40.2%	5.5% 12.8%
Others	7.4% 19.1%	66.7% 28.5%	25.9% 30.9%	0% 21.5%

Racial preferences in political representation

	Singaporean Chinese	Singaporean Malay	Singaporean Indian	New citizen from China	New citizen from India	New citizen of Western origin
To be the Prime Minister of Singapore	96.8% (95.6%)	69.6% (60.8%)	70.5% (64.3%)	9.1% (6.7%)	8.6% (5.8%)	9.4% (7.1%)
To be the President of Singapore	96.1% (93.2%)	82.2% (65.5%)	82% (70.6%)	8.9% (5.9%)	8.6% (4.8%)	9.6% (6.5%)

NOTE: Figures in brackets are from 2016 survey

Source: INSTITUTE OF POLICY STUDIES STRAITS TIMES GRAPHICS

minorities, believing that things would either stay the same or improve with regard to minorities being viewed based on merit rather than race.

But there was a divided response on whether there is majority privilege in Singapore. About 53.9 per cent of respondents agreed or strongly agreed that being of the majority race is an advantage in Singapore society, similar to the 2016 findings.

This division was also reflected in sentiments on whether the majority race has more resources and opportunities than other races.

The survey also found that respondents have become slightly more accepting of Singaporean Malays and Indians as family members, compared with five years ago.

When it came to professional relationships, respondents demonstrated approximately the same level of acceptance for Singaporean Chinese, Malays and Indians as colleagues or subordinates. However, they showed lower acceptance of new citizens as co-workers.

In addition, those polled had a mostly positive reception to economic-related policies of the Ethnic Integration Policy (EIP) and self-help groups, with more than 77 per cent saying the EIP helps to preserve racial harmony here.

The EIP determines the racial quota in Housing Board blocks or housing neighbourhoods.

When it came to policies related to politics, respondents showed more positive sentiments towards the group representation constituency (GRC) system than the reserved presidency.

Respondents felt that the GRC was more likely to help preserve racial harmony in Singapore and safeguard minority rights, and less likely to disadvantage the majority race and minorities.

In particular, 77.1 per cent of those polled felt that the GRC helps to preserve racial harmony, while 70.4 per cent felt the same about the reserved presidency.

Meanwhile, many respondents were found to be indifferent about potential future developments to do with race in Singapore, with the proportions who indicated that a given development would make no difference ranging from 40 per cent to 55 per cent. But 62.9 per cent of respondents felt that greater intercultural understanding would be good or very good.

yuntingc@sph.com.sg