NUS to open new residential college with a focus on artificial intelligence in August

More students will get to live and learn on campus, as the National University of Singapore (NUS) opens another residential college at University Town in August.

Acacia College, its fifth such residential space on campus, will open its doors to its first cohort of 100 first-year students across all disciplines for its two-year programme. It will be the first college in NUS to focus on artificial intelligence (AI).

In the first year, the new residential college will also house 100 second-year students to support its activities and mentor freshmen. It will have a total of 600 students by August 2026.
